Lester Brown helped pioneer the concept of environmental sustainability by creating the first research institute in 1974 devoted to analyzing environmental issues on a global basis, Worldwatch Institute. He founded Earth Policy Institute in 2001 to provide modeling for sustainable economies.

Lester Brown has been described as "one of the world's most influential thinkers" by the Washington Post. The Telegraph of Calcutta called him "the guru of the environmental movement." The recipient of 24 honorary degrees, Brown has been honored with a MacArthur "genius" Fellowship, and the United Nations Environment Prize. In 1986, the Library of Congress requested his papers for its archives, noting that his writings "have already strongly affected thinking about problems of world population and resources. He's published 50 books which have been translated into over forty languages.

Lester Brown started his professional career as a farmer in southern New Jersey, his native state, when it was still the garden state. In 1958, he and his younger brother were marketing a million and a half pounds of tomatoes a year. After obtaining a degree in agricultural science from Rutgers in 1955, he spent six months living in rural India where he became familiar with food and population issues. Brown earned a masters degree in agricultural economics from the University of Maryland and in public administration from Harvard. In 1964, he became a foreign policy advisor to Secretary of Agriculture, Orville Freeman, and two years later, administrator of the department's International Agricultural Development Service.

In 1974, he founded Worldwatch Institute, the first research institute devoted to analyzing environmental issues on a global basis. During his time there, he launched the World Watch paper series, the Worldwatch book series, State of the World reports, World Watch magazine, and Vital Signs: The Trends That Are Shaping Our Future.
